Content index I've been reading through the basic teaching writing skills of Judith Hochman. Very convincing! In it, she describes the power of writing as the most rigorous and challenging ability to learn, and wisely advises the intense intentionality, consistent in teaching it - that is, not only having children 'write a lot' but having them learn to create the basic forms of writing, especially the phrase, in a methodical progression that shows them how and has the full exercises repeatedly even fluid. An example of a productive exercise she suggests is "But, Because, so" in shthat makes students familiarize themeselves and flow with syntactic drappath they are used to process what students are invited to take students familiarize themeselves and flow with syntactic arrappath. Which students are already learning in class. Any class. Thus, they can and should use this exercises throughout the curriculum. So, for example, you can ask students to use it in the science class to add to this phrase: A solid melts to form a liquid because heat or pressure causes the ordering of molecules to disintegrate. A solid melts to form a liquid because heat or pressure causes the ordering of molecules to disintegrate. A solid melts to form a liquid so that a glacif is really water waiting to happen.
